Did You Know?

Complements of Ranger Six

We have all been admonished to drink lots of water on the day of a Cowboy Match. This is easy to do when it's warmer outside, but when the temperature is cooler we tend not to think about it. The body is constantly losing water via excretion of waste, perspiration (even when not noticeable) and evaporation from mucus membranes. When fluid loss exceeds fluid intake the body enters a state of dehydration. It can respond to this in a variety of ways, including impaired cognitive function and altered vision. The eye can experience reduction in tear production affecting ocular surface stability resulting in blurred vision and light sensitivity. Also possible is the presence or increase of floaters in the vision. Even at mild levels, dehydration can significantly impair cognitive function by decreasing brain energy, metabolism, shrinking of brain cells and disruption of nerve signals. This commonly reduces concentration, slows reaction time and affects memory (and here you thought it was the sound of the timer going off that was responsible).

So even if you do not feel thirsty it is a good idea to keep taking in fluids (and no, you cannot just drink more beer because alcohol inhibits the anti-diuretic hormone - Vasopressin - which causes you to pee more leading to greater dehydration). I have found that drinking a bottle of water with electrolytes added prior to a match and at least two bottles during the match has helped reduce the number of senior moments I experience.
